I am at a disadvantage when it comes to growing vegetables. I have a lot of trees and shade that keep plants away from the sunlight that they love. This year I am trying a little container gardening. I have 2 salad tomato plants, some herbs and a zucchini and eggplant all growing in pots. I even planted a few seeds, but I started a little late on those. I will just have to hope I can get them going enough to harvest something before fall. Fresh basil comes in very small packs at my grocery store so growing it at home will surely give me more at little cost. Plus it's there when I need it. It has been fun working with the plants no matter how much they produce, I am certain I can get my money back out of them, and they make a nice little hobby for getting outside in the summer.
